

*Consider the possibility of soaring.
What is often perceived as failure
is better understood as practice.
A bird is not born able to fly,
but rather a bird is born equipped to fly.
The moment when consistent attempts and practice
intersects with appropriate development and right timing,
that is the moment when a bird can fly.
The potential for flight is always within them
from their very beginning;
it just takes time.
You are also equipped to fly.
You have everything it takes to soar.*
